Section A: Nur ed-Din (1118-1174)

Historical background

Nur ed-Din (reigned 1146-1174) came to power in Northern Syria and Iraq after the assassination of his father, and spent the rest of his long reign attempting (largely successfully) to unify the Muslim world against the threat of Crusaders from the West. He thought carefully about how to create an idea of Muslim unity, and spent much of his own money and time making that idea a reality. Many historians think that the achievements of his more famous successor, Saladin, would have been impossible without the efforts of Nur ed-Din.

Don't worry at all if you have never studied Nur ed-Din or any Middle Eastern history. No 'own knowledge' is expected or required. All the information you need is to be found in the paper.

Examine all the Sources, and then answer ALL the questions which follow.

Source A

Adapted from Christopher Tyerman's book God's War (2006), on the Crusades:

'Nur ed-Din's image as the pious, just, puritanical warrior was displayed on inscriptions and coins and in the funding of religious learning, schools, scholars and mosques. He cultivated a reputation as a just ruler and judge, and knowledgeable student of the law and theologian, educated, literate, orthodox... Nur ed-Din's piety apparently increased after serious illnesses, in 1157 and 1159, and a defeat by the Crusaders in front of the castle of Krak des Chevaliers in 1163...'

Source B

An inscription from the minbar (a pulpit in a mosque from which sermons are given on Fridays) in one of Nur ed-Din's mosques, originally in Arabic:

'To judge rightly is my duty and my delight. If I fail to give justice, may Allah remove my leadership and even take my life. My rule means justice throughout my lands, and to all Muslims. May Allah assist me in all ways.'

Source C

The Nur ed-Din Mosque in Hama, Syria (completed 1172). This is one of a network of mosques (with accompanying schools and bath-houses) which Nur ed-Din had built during his reign. Each mosque was built using the distinctive stripy pattern of white limestone and black basalt, especially on the minaret (the tower from which the call to prayer is delivered). All of Nur ed-Din's mosques were recognisably his.

Source D Ibn Al Athir (1160-1233), an Arab writer, described Nur ed-Din in his book The Complete History:

'Nur ed-Din was a tall, swarthy man with a beard but no moustache, a fine forehead and a pleasant appearance enhanced by beautiful, melting eyes. His kingdom extended far and wide, and his power was acknowledged even in Medina and Mecca and the Yemen...

... His food and clothing and all his personal expenditure came out of income from properties bought with his legal share of booty and money allocated for communal Muslim interests. His wife complained to him of his austerity, and so he allotted to her, from his private property, three shops in Homs [a Syrian town] that would bring her in [an income each year]. When she objected that this was not much, he said: 'I have no more. Of all the wealth I have at my disposal, I am but the custodian for the Muslim community, and I do not intend to deceive them over this or cast myself into hell-fire for your sake.'
